

To Whom It May Concern,

Kate has been 'good at art' ever since she stopped eating her crayons.

After finishing her 'A' levels she wasn't quite sure what to do, so to put off having to work for a living she went to art college,

She did a degree course in Graphic Design which gave her a good grounding in traditional typography and taught her about Magic Markers, Letraset and pubs.

Straight after gaining her BA she got a job in a studio as a trainee graphic designer, and gradually progressed from to Magic Markers to Apple Macintosh.

After working really very hard for 12 years Kate decided she needed a change, so she set off with a backpack to see the world - first stop New Zealand. She met a chef, and to her surprise spent the next 12 years in New Zealand running restaurants.

By 2009 Kate had got fed up with mopping up after customers, so she resumed her previous design career and got involved in myriad design projects in NZ - from creating logos to building giant vegetables.

In 2011 she returned to England to be nearer family, and is currently on her best behaviour, living in Portishead, Somerset.

Kate will tackle any design project with enthusiasm and flair. She is mostly friendly, and will happily work on her own or as part of a team.

She is able to work well under pressure and is quite good at spelling...
